The topic Euthanasia: A Theological Approach euthanasia inspires a variety of strong views of which the 'slippery slope' argument is one. Non-harm - the principle of ahimsa Hinduism and Buddhism regard all life not just human life as involved in the process above therefore they say that we should try to avoid harming living things this rules out killing people, even if they want to die The sanctity of life Religious people often refer to the sanctity of life or say that human life is sacred. Until such questions are publicly debated and answered, there will always be difficulties in finding viable solutions to such phenomenological problems. Evidently, attempts to answer these questions are influenced by a number of factors. Essentially, those who challenge this particular court decision Euthanasia: A Theological Approach so on the basis that euthanasia is not yet lawful and will remain a moral problem and a misnomer in South Africa until the decision is ratified by the Constitutional Court. It also implies that, from a utilitarian perspective, the decision to end someone's life may well be taken by others and not necessarily by the person in question the patient. The difference in the modern age is that it is more effective, painless and quiet traditions on euthanasia.
