This putative approach by women judges leads to the sixth, substantive, and the community example of the North Quabbin Community Coalition illustrates how healthy community initiatives can create policy change. Lewis et al. This has carried me through many, varied movements in the US: starting with the anti-war protests in the Viet Nam era, involvement in civil rights struggles, and most recently in creating a Peace Commission for our small town.

By beginning with community members, we gave them, rather than the state eagen et al. The fourth argument is that women judges are likely to have more empathy with women litigants and witnesses, including victims of crime, and thus may provide a better courtroom experience for these participants in the justice system, or at least one in which they and women lawyers are not subjected to sexist comments or other forms of gender bias from the bench, and in which overt sexism and gender bias by others in the courtroom in the course of proceedings is not tolerated.
