See, I really love this kind of writing but lately all I've been reading are books with aesthetic language but said aesthetic language are used only to describe things. Since the hero is of course an imaginary character, a novelist cannot be prevented from idealizing him to whatever extent he chooses, if he Essence: a Short Story of Romance desires, but it is vital that he set predetermined limits for himself and do his best to stay within the bounds of human nature. Moreover, human nature was not the same then as .

The theatre is disadvantaged in this respect. Stirring tales of adventure, perils narrowly escaped, encounters with calamitous floods and fires, breathless suspense, circumstances heart-rending in their pathos, love stories passing through troubled beginnings to happy endings--all transport the absorbed reader away from reality into a fantasy world. Not only would a realistic reproduction on stage serve no purpose, it would also prove extremely difficult. And how do you know your phenomena are mute?
